the first Kings, and (at least in appearance) the first Emperors of Rome; the modern Dukes of Venice; and (in Bodins opinion) the Emperors of Germany: The second, Princes Subjects; owners of Sovereignty within their own Counties, and yet subject (one way or other) unto greater Princes; of which rank are the Kings presided by the great Turk; those that live under Pretter John; the ancient Princes of Italy, while they acknowledged, and held of the Empire; the ancient Dukes and Earls of France, while they afforded their Kings no more then a bare homage, and some small attendance in the Wars; the modern King of Bohemia, and Princes of the Empire: The third, Princes Seigneurs; which have an absolute power over the persons, and property in the possessions of their Subjects; as had the four first Monarchs of Assyria, Media, Persia, and Egypt: and as at this day the great Turk, Pretter John, the Muscovite, and some other such Tyrants have: The fourth, Princes Souverains (more moderate, and commodious for mankind, then the former) enjoy an absolute, but publick Sovereignty, not (much) intermeddling with the private; of which kind, the latter Emperours of Rome, with those of Constantinople, were, and at this day the most of the Kings, and Sovereign Princes of Christendom are: The fifth, Princes de race, or du sang; viz. The children, or Offspring of Sovereign Princes, who by their birth are capable of, or may come unto, a Crown; within which branch we may comprehend the eldest sons of Sovereign Kings; who not having any particular affection, or access, of title by creation (as our Prince) or by donation (as the eldest Son of France) are termed simply Princes:

The last, Princes, or Seigneurs, de Principautez, do seem to derive their dignity from certain ancient, and powerful vassals of the Crown; which having, in emulation of the Dukes and Earls of their time, incroached on all rights of Sovereignty within their own Dominions, and wanting (what the others had) a Title to distinguish them from less, or less absolute, Lords, very willingly took this upon them: Since which times the Kings of France remitting, by several means, the Estates of these usurpers unto the Crown, yet have been pleased to continue the name in such of their Favourites as have sued for it: And at this day some great Lords, which desire to be held Princes, are curious to procure one of their Towns to be made a Principauté, and afterwards bestow it, or (at least) the Title of it, on their eldest Sons: But these are no true Princes, and therefore in all Assemblies they be ranked beneath Earls.

Esseurs ; n'ayant autre moyen de vous monstrier, combien je suis desireux de vous faire service, j'ay prins la hardiesse vous presenter ce mien petit labeur, lequel vous prendrez, sil vous plaist, en gré : Oultre le Dictionnaire, auquel je pense avoir comprins tous les mots, ou la plus grande partie, de la langue Angloise ; j'y ay mis à la fin, quelques courtes reigles, pour vous aider à prononcer icelle langue ; & aussi tous les Verbes anomales, que j'ay peu amasser. Je pourray avoir failli en quelques endroits : car on trouvera on, ça bas, tant de perfection, qu'il n'y a rien à dire ? Mais j'espere que les fautes ne sont de telle nature, qu'elles ne soyent facilement pardonnables, par vostre grande courtoisie ; à la quelle je me recommande.

R.S de Londres.

TO THE ENGLISH READER.

IT could not be expected in so small a Volume, as I was inforced to contract my self into, that (in this English Dictionary) I should shew the Genders of all French Nouns, and the Conjugations of all French Verbs, which are most sufficiently done at large already by Mr. COTGRAVE; to whom I refer you. In giving the French Interpretation to the English words, I have for the most part, observed to set down first the Proper; then, the Translated and Metaphorical. Wherein if ye shall reap that profit by my pains, as may procure your favourable acceptance, I have my full wish.

Robert Sherwood.

A Caution to the Reader.

IN the English-French Dictionary 'tis to be observed, that those French words which are obsolete, and out of use, are printed in a ROMAN Letter, to distinguish them from those words which are sterling, and now currant among the French Nation; all which are to be found in the ITALIC Letter. Moreover divers Errors in [the former Dictionary are rectified.
